

Jackson Clarendon is a recent graduate of the University of Wyoming’s Environment and Natural Resources (ENR) program, and an avid outdoorsman, fisherman, and hunter. Most recently he’s worked in the reclamation industry in the Red Desert, though he’s spent time working with a conservation organization in Mongolia and horse packing in the Big Horns, his native range. He developed a passion for wildlife and wild lands from a childhood spent walking and working the family ranch while learning about stewardship and land ethic from his family. Currently residing in Laramie, he is an active member of both the environmental community, working part time with the Wyoming Wilderness Association, and the music community, performing in 2 local bands and the UW Symphony. Now more than ever, Jackson is committed to preserving the public lands and wildlife that make both our state and our country unique.
