

Reg Rothwell

I have more than 3 decades of experience in the field of wildlife management, and I am outdoors at least once per week year round. Hence, I have a great appreciation for, and a good understanding about, wildlife, outdoor recreation, access, our natural surroundings, and the challenges we face conserving and protecting these essential elements of our quality of life.

It is disingenuous to give the impression that in Wyoming we have to make a choice between these things or jobs and economic development. We can have both if we manage our growth and our renewable and nonrenewable resources intelligently. I am committed to working for a reasonable balance of economic well-being and sustaining those environmental and recreational qualities that attract so many of us to the state. After all, they are the critical elements of one of Wyoming’s most important industries – tourism.

WWF tackles many important issues each year, and we are involved in a number of long-term projects. Maintaining recreational access, protecting big game migration corridors using ground-breaking remote sensing technology, countering efforts to take away your public lands, promoting sportsperson recruitment and retention, long range land management planning, and fighting against habitat degradation and loss are WWF’s current highest priorities. I support and am involved in all these efforts.

I now serve as a WWF board member and as the affiliate representative to the National Wildlife Federation, helping coordinate work between the state and national organizations. And, in both capacities, I am dedicated to doing good things for wildlife and for you. I want to continue to be your advocate.
